

Dear Colleague:

I am writing to let you know that the special student member package developed last year will once again be available in 2011.

Students can join both IEEE and the IEEE Computer Society, plus get access to the Computer Society Digital Library (CSDL), for just $40!

To let your students know about this special offer, I ask two favors of you.

Number one—please display the enclosed IEEE Computer Society student membership recruitment poster in a prominent location. Number two—please share the enclosed application information with your students and encourage them to take advantage of the many benefits of student membership.

Student members now have round-the-clock access to the Computer Society Digital Library (CSDL)—giving them a wealth of resources from authoritative publications covering the entire spectrum of computing.

In addition to over 3,800 conference publications, CSDL includes access to Computer magazine, all 27 IEEE Computer Society periodicals, and the complete archives for all the publications.

Students pay just $40 for all this content and also have access to

- Free development software from Microsoft—such as Visual Studio Team System, Microsoft’s “top of the line” professional development tool
- 600 technical and business books from Safari® Books Online, with titles from top publishers such as O’Reilly Media, Peachpit, Cisco Press, and many others
- 30 scholarships, fellowships, and awards as well as hundreds of conference travel grants
- Valuable networking opportunities through one of more than 1,780 chapters and over 150 specialized computing chapters

Complete details about all benefits are featured in the enclosed application folder. Students can join online at www.computer.org/student2011

Encourage your students to become a member of both IEEE and the IEEE Computer Society today to begin enjoying benefits as soon as possible, including access to the CSDL.

Many thanks, in advance, for your help.

Sincerely,
James D. Isaak

2010 IEEE Computer Society President
